Striated was designed with display purposes in mind. Its three weights with their respective italics cater to a variety of application settings, be it in print or on screen. It can be categorised as a mixture between a grotesque and geometric typeface with a pinch of heavily formalised elements.

At its outset, Striated was inspired by a slab serif typeface from the Schelter & Giesecke type foundry, situated in Leipzig, Germany. Nevertheless, it is also clearly rooted in the experiments of the Bauhaus school of design and their pursuit to reduce letterforms to the utmost essential. The attempt of the International Typeface Corporation to capture the spirit surrounding Herbert Bayer and his colleagues at the infamous school in Dessau resulting in ITC Bauhaus, designed in 1975 by Edward Benguat and Victor Caruso, is still ubiquitous, whether directly or indirectly. Also, the urge of the Bauhaus to reduce where possible keeps permeating design practice today as one of the main approaches.

However futuristic these shapes then may be, due to the heavy exposure in the second half of the 20th century, carried by aspirations to conquer space, the moon first, and the numerous science fiction stories it spawned – with all their covers calling to be designed – they often seem a bit dusty from today’s perspective. This could be used as a design element itself, producing vintage flavoured ephemera.

Striated tries to find a balance in negotiating the past and future by evoking a feeling of being a well known old companion and shaking off the dust at the same time.
